Acknowledgments

While the compilation of this volume was the work of an individual, many others at Winterthur were instrumental in bringing it to completion. For their support and positive reaction to the original proposal, I am grateful to James Morton Smith, director, Charles F. Hummel, deputy director for collections, and Frank H. Sommer, head of the Library Division. To Eleanor McDowell Thompson and the ever-changing staff of the Printed Book and Periodical Collection, I am most appreciative for tightening the slack that was created while one of its members was relieved of his regular duties to work on this project. For outlining the work that was involved in perusing the museum's archives, I acknowledge with thanks Barbara A. Hearn and for the same assistance with the manuscript collection, Beatrice K. Taylor. The interest, questions, and general comments from Ian M. G. Quimby, editor, Catherine E. Hutchins, Alan Axelrod, and Carrie L. Dam, Publications Office, were more than valuable. To the word processing center, I would like to express my appreciation for their good humor and perseverance while transcribing the manuscript. Special thanks are due to Patricia R. Lisk, production assistant, and to Ellen M. Snyder, fellow in the Winterthur Program in Early American Culture, for their work on these pages. Susan L. Greenberg deserves a particular acknowledgment for her excellent, painstaking reading and editing of the final manuscript. Lastly, to the many Winterthur employees who offered suggestions while work was in progress, I am grateful.

Introduction

In his Guide to American Trade Catalogs, Lawrence Romaine discussed the usefulness of trade catalogues to researchers who were trying to understand our country's past: "Manuscript material and printed reports are indispensable," he wrote, "but the catalogs that actually sold the nation the inventions and improvements are the backbone of business history."¹

Business history or the history of technology are not the only disciplines that stand to benefit from the study of trade catalogues. Researchers interested in the design and construction of furniture often rely on catalogues as a source, since their artifacts have not usually survived in great numbers or in one convenient place. As Kenneth L. Ames, chairman of the Office of Advanced Studies at Winterthur, once stated, catalogues "can provide a scholar with more images of thoroughly documented artifacts than he could hope to gather in years of scouring museums, historical societies, and private collections."² House decoration, both architectural and that relating to the arrangement of furnishings, can be better understood by using catalogues. A modern-day interior designer or restoration consultant charged with reconstructing the inside of an old house cannot be said to have done an adequate job if he has not consulted trade catalogues of the same period. In a similar vein, reproductions of historic items should not be undertaken before considering the value the trade catalogue might lend to the project. Because it is not uncommon to have illustrations of the workplace at the front or the rear of catalogues, students of industrial and technological history have a fine source for examining machines, labor conditions, and procedures. The trade catalogue as an artifact itself is a useful tool for investigating the development of printing, especially during the late nineteenth century. It can also serve today's editors who may be looking for illustrations. Some observers have concluded that nineteenth-century advertising was unsophisticated; the survival of trade catalogues into our century provides the evidence to substantiate or refute this contention. historians will find the trade catalogue useful, since some companies employed talented artists as illustrators. Collectors of tools would be wise to consider the trade catalogue for dating their wares and, perhaps, for discovering just what function they performed. The richness of tool catalogues is suggested by the late eighteenth-century catalogue of tools for watch- and clockmakers issued by John Wyke of Liverpool. A facsimile edition of this fascinating document, annotated and with introduction by Alan Smith, was published for the museum in 1978 by the University Press of Virginia. Historians of medicine will find illustrations of the instruments doctors once used and the medicinal cures that were offered in the bottle or packet. In short, the trade catalogue is an excellent primary source for scholars in many fields of American history. Although it was originally intended as a short-lived merchandising tool, the trade catalogue is now an important source of information on the material life of our forebears.

Winterthur library's trade catalogue collection contains approximately 2,000 items. While there are a number of important late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century imprints, most of the catalogues date from 1870 to 1910. Firms represented in the library's collection include furniture makers, silversmiths, clothing manufacturers, potters, saddlers, and architects. The trade catalogue collection increases in size by about 250 items annually. It is the purpose of this guide to present in a systematic fashion the contents of Winterthur's trade catalogue collection. In this guide, trade catalogue refers to broadsides, broadsheets, pamphlets, manuscripts, and books issued by businesses and individuals to entice the public to buy products.

Winterthur has not been alone in assembling a collection of trade catalogues. Libraries ranging from that of Smithsonian Institution, with over 320,000 catalogues, to those of local historical agencies, with only a few, have been acquiring them as well. Winterthur's collection remains unique, however, because its purpose is to document American material life up to World War I. In contrast, the collections at other institutions are frequently oriented toward a single subject. The Corning Museum of Glass in Corning, New York, is assembling a fine collection of trade catalogues on the glass industry; the Eleutherian Mills Historical Library in Wilmington, Delaware, collects catalogues that document America's technological and business growth; in New York City, Columbia University's Avery Library is building a collection of architectural sources, principally for the use of graduate students in the architectural preservation program; and the Athenaeum of Philadelphia is particularly strong in catalogues for nineteenth-century house paint and lighting fixtures. The late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries are most heavily represented in the trade catalogue collection at Winterthur. Other libraries focus their collections on different periods. New York City's Cooper-Hewitt Museum, for example, is putting together a collection of current publications that feature building and renovator supplies, reproductions from stores and museums, and general-interest collectibles. According to its former librarian, Cooper-Hewitt hopes to assemble a collection of late twentieth-century catalogues that will match, in subject matter, their counterparts from the nineteenth century.

Over the years at least five types of trade catalogues were circulated. Perhaps the most familiar is the mail-order catalogue whose notoriety is due to the popularity of such firms as Sears, Roebuck, and Company and Montgomery Ward. Located for the most part in the Midwest, these businesses appealed to rural Americans living in that part of the country and farther west because they offered a way to buy products then fashionable in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. New clothing, efficient machinery, the latest in home decorations, and timesaving appliances were at the fingertips of an increasingly mobile population. A burgeoning rail system made deliveries possible throughout the nation.

Similar in form but different in concept was the catalogue that offered premiums to its readers. Typically, such a firm enlisted the assistance of people in a town to sell its products, and in gratitude for their orders then offered them merchandise at a modest price. Winterthur's collection contains a few examples of this sort of mail-order publication, such as the catalogue issued by Larkin Company of Buffalo, New York.

In addition to publishing catalogues for mail orders, businesses printed brochures that were distributed at no cost to prospective patrons who attended functions where the firm's products were displayed. The library was exceedingly fortunate in 1968 to acquire one lot of material concerning the World's Columbian Exposition, held in Chicago in 1893 to commemorate the 400th anniversary of Christopher Columbus's voyage to the Americas. Among the hundreds of items are a number of publications printed and handed out by companies plying their wares at the fair. Significant among them are catalogues that detail agricultural implements and machinery, one of the categories of this guide.

The fourth type of catalogue, the kind with the greatest representation in this guide, is the publication issued "for the trade only." Such volumes were circulated to retailers by manufacturers to present their latest goods hoping that they would be preferred over competitors' stock when shelves and showrooms needed to be replenished. Merchandise could be sold on site if already ordered or could be requested through the catalogue if the customer so desired. Discounts were regularly included on separate sheets laid in the catalogue or in handwritten form near the descriptions of the products. Many firms undoubtedly hoped that this information would not be passed on to the public. Some were bold enough to state explicitly that the general public did not need to know the difference between production costs and selling prices. On the other hand, some businesses willingly publicized low prices. They were, to them, a selling point. Frequently, for economic reasons, one edition of a catalogue for the trade was designed to last for a number of years and would be updated with either supplements or price lists. Some of the entries contained herein are, in fact, for these supplements and price lists. It is regrettable that their larger companions could not be included.

Finally, since they were sometimes used differently from the other four types, broadsides are the fifth kind of catalogue to be considered. In addition to being circulated through the mail or from hand to hand, broadsides were posted in prominent locations for all to see. They promoted sales, announced the arrival of new merchandise, proclaimed new partnerships, and reminded their readers of new or additional store locations. The posted broadside was an inexpensive way to reach a wide audience and was a major part of retail advertising strategy during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.

Winterthur's trade catalogue collection serves a nationwide community of scholars. A researcher from California used the horticultural sources in an attempt to reconstruct nineteenth-century gardens; one from Austin, Texas, interested in restoring a Victorian-era house, needed to know about lighting fixtures; a firm in Washington, D.C., hoped to learn about potters that supplied a late nineteenth-century urban residence where an archaeological dig was taking place; a graduate student from George Washington University's museum program used the furniture catalogues in the collection to help with her study of patent folding furniture; another Texas resident perused art supply catalogues in order to discover how women spent their leisure time; a graduate student from Cornell University examined catalogues that showed kitchen utensils; a museum professional from Los Angeles conducted a study of colonial revival furniture by using the catalogues of Grand Rapids, Michigan, furniture firms; and one person consulted catalogues of turn-of-the-century silversmiths to help her determine, for insurance purposes, the original value of a silverware set that had been stolen from her home. This guide will introduce others to the research potential of the trade catalogue collection at Winterthur. This publication also stands as an independent bibliographical tool, suggesting a genre of historical records useful to individuals studying our country's past.

The compilation of this work would have been a simpler task if each catalogue had described only one kind of product. Such, alas, was not the case. In the early stages of formulating categories, I had intended to adopt Romaine's but found that they were too specialized. For example, he had separate sections for china/pottery and glassware; however, a cursory examination of Winterthur's catalogues revealed that firms frequently sold both ceramics and glassware and commonly offered them through the same publication. At other times it was necessary to select one category from two or more logical ones to record a catalogue. Trade catalogues attempting to interest the public in purchasing bicycles, for instance, might have been included under either "Vehicles and Equestrian Supplies" or "Entertainment, Leisure Activities, and Recreational Goods"; they would fit in the former. Catalogues of metal goods proved to be the most perplexing of all since they could logically appear in any one of several sections, such as "Hardware, Cutlery, Utensils, and Hand Tools," "Iron and Steel Goods," "Silver and Silver-Plated Goods," or "Architectural Building Plans and Materials." One lesson learned in compiling this guide is that the function of an object can be just as important as its form or material when deciding which category to choose.

Most entries in the guide contain name of firm as it appears on the catalogue, location, title, date, pagination, record of illustrations, height in centimeters, and annotations on the company and the catalogue. All the annotations are based on information found in the catalogues. It would have been useful if research had been conducted that further identified all the people and firms responsible for issuing catalogues, but such an effort would have increased the scope of this project and would have delayed its appearance in print—perhaps indefinitely. As they stand, these annotations will furnish leads to the researcher which may be explored further either at Winterthur or at other institutions holding collections of trade catalogues and related material.

An instrumental factor in helping to secure the decision of the National Endowment for the Humanities to designate Winterthur a Center for Advanced Study was the strength of the library's collection of materials on American decorative arts, including their European influences, and on United States social history. One segment of the library that properly contributes to the effectiveness of the museum as a research center is the trade catalogue collection. While collections elsewhere may be larger, none is currently being assembled on the same scale or for the same reasons Winterthur has chosen. The collection of trade catalogues is large and diversified enough to offer a good sample for researchers studying the decorative arts and American material culture. It is also large and diversified enough to provide librarians, through this publication, with a useful example for organizing their own collections.

How to Use This Guide

In an effort to organize the trade catalogues for this guide, thirty subject categories were created. Many that appear here were first used by Lawrence Romaine in his pioneering Guide to American Trade Catalogs, 1744-1900, while others were suggested by the nature of the Winterthur collection. The table of contents lists the categories followed by their reference numbers. Within each category, catalogues are listed by the name of the firm, using the surname as the key word if the company was named after a person. When a name was not provided, the catalogue title was used. To aid the user further a chronological index, a geographical index, and an alphabetical index are provided. The categories, the catalogues within each category, and the index entries are arranged alphabetically letter by letter up to the first mark of punctuation, ignoring word spaces. Main-entry reference numbers are in semi-bold type.

Each index includes an entry by either a company name or a catalogue title. In the chronological index, main headings consist of the years the trade catalogues were published. Each catalogue, entered by company or catalogue name and location, is arranged alphabetically under the year. The geographical index is divided into two sections: American businesses listed alphabetically by state then city; and foreign catalogues listed alphabetically under country, province (where applicable), and city. The alphabetical, or name/subject, index consists of an inclusive alphabetized sequence of the businesses and their products. It also includes any organizations or proprietors mentioned in the annotations; these secondary references are indicated by an asterisk.
